

UNITED STATES

Mrs. Fels and the newly-formed National Single Tax League of The United States

Resolution adopted January 4th and signed on behalf of the Committee by Frederic C. Howe, Lincoln Steffens, and Bolton Hall—

The conference expresses its appreciation of Mrs. Fels' devotion to the realization of the dream of Joseph Fels, which is the waking thought of each of us and which we, in common with her, see coming to realization through our common efforts.

In view of the increasing body of women voters, we regard it as particularly auspicious that we have a woman so prominent as a leader.

We recognize that her aid in organization and support of the infant National League foreshadows continued mutual helpfulness and co-operation.

And finally, we express our appreciation of the dignified headquarters so admirably adapted for its purposes selected and provided by Mrs. Fels.

TEXAS

THE REBEL, Socialist weekly of Texas, devotes the front page of its issue of January 6th to an appeal for a "Great Adventure," on the lines of the recent Single Tax effort in California, which shall secure to Texas the honour of being the first State to destroy land monopoly. The policy is stated in precise terms, as follows:—

THE GREAT ADVENTURE.

TO RESTORE THE LAND AND ITS RESOURCES TO THE PEOPLE—QUICKLY.

To stop the confiscation of public values by private persons and corporations.

To abolish privilege and speculation in the people's means of subsistence.

To unseat plutocracy and found a new order of society based on human values instead of property "rights."

Some interesting information about Texas is given. The area of the State is greater and the soil more productive than any other State in the Union, but out of a total of 172,000,000 acres only 27,000,000 are cultivated. Texas stands alone as a great State that is not "cursed with big cities," only possessing one with a population as large as 100,000—San Antonio. Seventy per cent. of the people live away from the sound of a railroad or factory whistle, and this, in the opinion of THE REBEL, is the reason why the Great Adventure will win in Texas first, the big city being "the graveyard of real democracy." Against the 300,000 men and women who voted for this reform in California, THE REBEL claims that here are 40,000 in Texas, plus half a dozen organisations which have endorsed the programme.

The appeal concludes with these words:—

So let us fare forth on the Great Adventure in Texas. Let us open the idle acres for the idle men. Then we shall strip the cities that man made and open the country that God made. We will have three jobs for one man instead of three men for one job. The Magdalene will no longer patrol the pavements. The out-of-work will disappear. The penitentiaries will be evacuated. Colleges will spring up on the plains and valleys. Science will expand. Wealth will increase ten-fold. Inventions will multiply. Our years will increase. The dread of uncertain living will disappear; and if there is a heaven after death we shall know how to enjoy it because for the first time the race will have served an apprenticeship in happiness here below.

Dr. McGLYNN

We have received from the Dr. McGlynn Monument Association, New York, a number of pamphlets by and about the late Dr. Edward McGlynn. These include a reprint of Dr. McGlynn's famous speech, "The Cross of a New Crusade" which was delivered at the Academy of Music, New York, after he had been suspended from the service of the Catholic Church, as a re-statement and vindication of his position as a priest in preaching and working for the single tax. There is also a reprint of the doctrinal statement which was presented by Dr. McGlynn to the Apostolic Delegate, Monsignor Francisco Satolli, and which, having been examined by four professors of the Catholic University of Washington and declared to contain nothing contrary to Catholic teaching, led to Dr. McGlynn's reinstatement. No more beautiful and convincing summary of Henry George's teaching has ever been written, and we wish it a wide circulation among the present generation. Those who are interested in Dr. McGlynn's life and work should communicate with the Secretary of the Monument Association, Sylvester L. Malone, 110-2, East 59th Street, New York City.

CATHOLIC VIEWS ON LAND "OWNING"
Irish Bishop's Notable Dictum

I feel that the following remarks of Abbé Naudet in his work on Sociology deserve quotation, if only because they can be applied so exactly to our own landowners, great and small, and express so perfectly their outlook:—

Say to one of our great proprietors that he has no right to leave his lands uncultivated, that the land should nourish man and not be used, in vast extent, as a hunting ground for idlers. The great proprietor will look at you in astonishment and candidly answer: "The land is mine, and I can do what I like with it." He is mistaken. He imagines himself honest and he is in error. He is evidently ignorant of his social duty because, as Mr. Ketteler observes in one of his admirable discourses, the doctrine that makes man the god of his property, which he ought to distribute among his poor brethren—that gives him the right to satisfy his unbridled sensuality as he pleases—is a doctrine not only unchristian but unnatural.

Although Mr. Ryan is apparently only a layman, it must not be supposed that his views are confined to the Irish laity. Continuing his article he quotes some "brief but luminous remarks" from a speech delivered by the Most Rev. Dr. Kelly, the Catholic Bishop of Ross, so recently as August, 1914, at a meeting of the Irish Council of Agriculture. His Lordship said:—

False fundamental ideas lead to a great deal of mischief. I am old enough to remember a time when there was a notion in this country that the owners of land were absolute owners, and that they could do what they liked with the land. They were fortified in that notion by their legal advisers, and they came to grief because they held a false principle. I want to warn the farmers of Ireland, and all my sympathy is with the farmers—farmers and fishermen make up the majority of my flock—I want to warn them against taking up this false idea of absolute ownership in their purchased-out lands. They are bound to use that land for feeding themselves and for the feeding of the nation. If they show a selfish policy in trying to use the land for their own benefit only, and to the detriment of national or neighbourly interest, or of the wider interests of humanity, then it would be the duty of the nation to step in and deprive them of that land, and to create some new system by which the land could be used for the benefit of the nation.

We regret that space does not permit a more ample quotation or reference to this most interesting article.

Its writer, however, says one or two things for which space must be found.

Above all, the farmers or landowners must not adopt nor act upon the pernicious principle already referred to: "This land is mine and I'll do what I like with it." Land, it cannot be too clearly emphasised, is a form of property different from any other. No man whether landlord or tenant farmer, has the right to do what he likes with the land he owns or occupies. The principle is equally binding upon the purchased-out tenant farmer of our day and upon the landlord, present or past. If the principle of absolute ownership is admitted, Clanrickard would have the same right to turn countrysides in Galway, or Carden or Scully the plains of Tipperary into vast ranches as the farmer of to-day in Galway and Tipperary has to turn his holding into a miniature ranch.

So that while with regard to chattel property a man may fairly claim to "do what he likes with his own," that claim cannot properly be advanced with regard to land.—"Circumspect" in the GLASGOW OBSERVER, January 27th.

BOOK REVIEWS

CREATION AND POSSESSION

Radically-minded people will gladly associate themselves with most of the principles laid down by Mr. Bertrand Russell in his views on Social Reconstruction. In his recently-published series of eight lectures,* he brings to the touch-stone of philosophical Liberalism such questions as the State, War as an Institution, Property, Education, Marriage, and the Churches. If politics were a religion, we should say that Mr. Russell has given us here the kind of literature the radical revivalists will welcome for their inspiration in the new fight for the restoration of democracy. His style is brilliant and full of charm, and for that reason his criticisms of the laws and institutions that produce social wrongs and international bloodshed are all the more destructive. We are interested specially in what he says about the land question, and find in his chapter on Property one good cause why the late Lord Cromer, in his review in the SPECTATOR, has dubbed the work a "thoroughly mischievous book":—

Private property in land has no justification except historically through the power of the sword. In the beginning of feudal times, certain men had enough military strength to be able to force those whom they disliked not to live in a certain area. Those whom they chose to leave on the land became their serfs, and were forced to work for them in return for the gracious permission to stay. In order to establish law in place of private force, it was necessary, in the main, to leave undisturbed the rights which had been acquired by the sword. The land became the property of those who had conquered it, and the serfs were allowed to give rent instead of service. There is no justification for private property in land, except the historical necessity to conciliate turbulent robbers who would not otherwise have obeyed the law. This necessity arose in Europe many centuries ago, but in Africa the whole process is often quite recent. It is by this process, slightly disguised, that the Kimberley diamond-mines and the Rand gold-mines were acquired in spite of prior native rights. It is a singular example of human inertia that men should have continued until now to endure the tyranny and extortion which a small minority are able to inflict by their possession of the land. No good to the community, of any sort or kind, results from the private ownership of land. If men were reasonable they would decree that it would cease to-morrow, with no compensation beyond a moderate life income to the present holders.

The mere abolition of rent would not remove injustice, since it would confer a capricious advantage upon the occupiers of the best sites and the most fertile land. It is necessary that there should be rent, but it should be paid to the State or to some body which performs public services; or, if the total rental were more than is required for such purposes, it might be paid into a common fund and divided equally among the population. Such a method would be just, and would not only help to relieve poverty, but would prevent wasteful employment of land and the tyranny of local magnates. Much that appears as the power of capital is really the power of the landowner—for example, the power of railway companies and mine-owners. The evil and injustice of the present system are glaring, but men's patience of preventable evils to which they are accustomed is so great that it is impossible to guess when they will put an end to this strange absurdity.

Holding these views, and suggesting the results of extortion on the distribution of wealth, Mr. Russell, however, is not so convincing in the emphasis he lays on mere impulses as the cause of war and strife. He discounts more than once the influence of economic conditions and how they have distorted men's minds through their effects in unequal possessions. He sees the solution not so much in improved social environment, but in the diminution of the impulses and desires that centre round possession. The two warring forces that act as incentives in human action are the "creative" and the "possessive," and we are told that:—

The ultimate fact from which war results is not economic or political, and does not rest upon any mechanical difficulty of inventing means for the peaceful settlement of international disputes. The ultimate fact from which war results is the fact that a large proportion of mankind have an impulse to conflict rather than harmony, and can only be brought to co-operate with others in resisting or attacking a common enemy. . . . The impulse to quarrelling and self-assertion, the pleasure of getting one's own way in spite of opposition, is native to most men. It is this impulse, rather than any motive of calculated self-interest, which produces war, and causes the difficulty of bringing about a World-State.

It is a familiar idea to picture man as ruled by opposing influences or spirits that are eternally in combat for the possession of his soul—God and Satan, Ormuzd and Ahriman, good and evil. The late L. H. Berens wrote of the "industrial and the predatory instincts," forming the same conception as Mr. Russell with his "creative and possessive impulses," but he did not overlook the fact that the predatory instinct can only be exercised in a condition of license and injustice. What makes the predatory instinct dangerous and destructive of society is not the fact of its existence as an inevitable part of human nature, but that economic conditions have made it possible and easy for some human beings to be birds of prey and parasites on other human beings. Given a state of affairs in which tribute can be levied under the law, in which the appropriation of rent is made over to individuals as an accepted institution, in which a tariff makes theft legal, the predatory instinct gains full sway, and both victims and victimised desire nothing higher than a hand in the spoil.

The economic and political circumstances making for excess wealth side by side with extreme poverty cannot be so under-rated. It was once said "Lead us not into Temptation." But the world—the economic world—surrounds us with temptations to commit the gravest of social sins, the enjoyment of wealth without producing it, by obtaining the possession of land for which others must pay rent. There should be no temptations to be led into, and none to incite the predatory instinct. The earth should be for all, and if each lived in it, commanding no service from another unless he gave an equivalent service by his own labour or industry, there would be no occasion for strife and certainly no possible outlet for that brutal passion which Mr. Russell calls the "possessive impulse."
