

A Socialist looks at the Unions

By E. P. MIDDLETON

What's Wrong With The Unions?

By Eric Wigham, Penguin Special, 3s. 6d.

THE author of this excellent book is a journalist of long standing and a labour correspondent since the last war. He is a man who has an understanding of unions and deep sympathies with unionists' needs. That does not, however, prevent him from sharply criticising many aspects of union policy and methods and the attitudes, often destructive of their avowed principles and aims, of unionists themselves.

In an early chapter, "A Plantless Society," Mr. Wigham clearly indicates his own political sympathies, which may be broadly described as Labour-Socialist. His aim, therefore, in this book is not to decry the value or importance of unionism, but to show how the unions are their own worst enemies.

Readers will look in vain for any evidence of economic wisdom tending to throw doubts on the usefulness, or otherwise, of unions within the social and economic community; yet they may draw their own conclusions from the copious examples Mr. Wigham gives of union shortcomings and human failings that tend, inevitably, to create frustration, even stalemate, in employee-employer relations and to postpone indefinitely the day when Labour and Capital will work harmoniously in production.

Here are Mr. Wigham's main criticisms:

1. That unions over-work and under-pay their leaders, employ too few experts and do practically no public relations work.
2. Their dues are too low.
3. Their link with the Labour Party damages their interests.
4. Their structure is out of date and they have no long-term policy.
5. Rivalries cause major strikes and demarcation rules damage industry.
6. There is too much reliance on the "closed shop" idea in preference to recruitment.
7. Union authority is breaking down and unofficial strikes are increasing.
8. Communist control is the result of apathy.

9. Vindictive action against non-strikers is a destructive policy.

10. Excessive power wielded by use of the block vote at national conferences is anti-democratic.

11. Restrictive practices reduce output and so endanger jobs.

It is a formidable list which, in the main, adds up to a picture of human indifference, on the one hand, and fanatical idealism gone astray, on the other.

One of the most illuminating chapters in the book is entitled "Descendants of King Ludd," in which Mr. Wigham's description of restrictive practices and their ill-effects demonstrates, not only the methods which harassed and ignorant men will adopt in their desperation, but, unconsciously no doubt, how inevitably both employees and employers are forced into this kind of warfare by the basic injustice of society. Given equal rights to the resources of nature and complete freedom of trade, the individual would no longer need such organisations as trade unions to protect him from exploitation, any more than he would have to suffer the spoliation of taxation, "credit squeezes" or "wage pause." Only then could the phrase "the dignity of labour" have a comprehensible meaning.

There is pessimism in the author's closing words: "As I look at these carefully drawn-up suggestions, I cannot avoid a feeling of frustration. I am quite satisfied that most, if not all, would benefit the trade union movement. I am equally sure that few, if any, will be adopted."

This book is one more addition to the documentation of the futile struggle on which so many good men and women waste their substance. One can only hope that it will lead a few more such to a closer examination of the true causes of our economic and social malaise.

Land Reform First

By PAVLOS GIANNELIAS

Struggle and Misery in the Underdeveloped Countries

By Peter Ussing Olsen, "Nature and Culture."

UNDER the title of "Struggle and Misery in the Underdeveloped Countries," the Swedish editor of "Nature and Culture" has published the translation of a very profound and detailed study by Peter Ussing Olsen, member of the Danish Georgeist Party (Retsforbund). This book is concerned with land distribution, land tenure and the struggle against hunger and exploitation in a number of countries throughout Africa, Asia and South America. The situation in Japan, Communist China, Formosa, India and Israel is presented in a particularly interesting manner. The so-often-neglected, or even intentionally evaded, question of land and its taxation is discussed from the point of the philosophy of Henry George. Most readers will agree with Peter Olsen that the abolition of misery in the underdeveloped countries requires first of all reform of land ownership. Once this has been realised, industrialisation, capitalisation and trade would follow. However, there are many difficulties at present standing in the way of radical land reform.

There is a difference, in their relation to the soil, between the primitive peasant and the worker in a well-organised and mechanised agriculture. Ideological contrasts between East and West, geographical and geological conditions; religious and cultural beliefs, and historical habits and traditions must also be taken into consideration.

Notwithstanding these differences, there is a fundamental ideal common to all: a righteous and moral respect for life and property. This ideal can be traced in the wisdom of Confucius, Moses and Socrates (or preferably Solon) down through Christ, Quesnay, Turgot, Henry George, Sun Yat Sen, Vinoba Bhave of India and Zwi Schapira of Israel. Peter Olsen concludes with the following: "Reform of land ownership is the first step towards progress in the underdeveloped countries, because this radical step will prevent the exploitation of one by the other. Land value, created by all, must be collected by the community in the form of rent, allowing to each the fruits of his own labour and enterprise."

(Continued from Page 19)

Lancashire. It seems that the proportion of the cost of a speculatively built house which a builder will now allocate to the land has changed enormously since pre-war days—Boult, Son & Maples, Liverpool.

Leicestershire. Demand for residential property to let seems insatiable.—Andrew & Ashwell, Leicester.

Lincolnshire. Agricultural land: the supply of agricultural land, particularly that with vacant possession, continues to fall far short of demand, and prices have risen during the year.—Escritt & Barrell, Grantham.

Northumberland. Tyneside is desperately short of land for both residential and commercial development, and it is small wonder that high prices have been paid to fortunate owners whose land has been "blessed" with planning consent.—Sanderson, Townend & Gilbert, Newcastle upon Tyne.

Somerset. Farm amalgamations continue, and high prices have been given for farms with good land and poor buildings where the purchase has been with the object of obtaining further land irrespective of buildings ...—Clutton, Halsey & Svensson, Bath.

Suffolk. An unsatisfied demand still exists for old cottages capable of conversion into a single modernised residence.—Lucy Scott & Sons, Bury St. Edmunds.

Surrey. In this area the effect of the Green Belt has a great deal to do with the shortage of land and the consequent high prices which can be obtained when the land does become available, particularly in small parcels and even in single plots.—Dudley W. Harris & Co., Egham, Surrey.

Sussex. Throughout the south of England there is an acute shortage of building land and we are unable to satisfy even retaining clients.—Whitehead & Whitehead, Chichester and Branches.

Yorkshire. So far, the summer Budget seems to have had little effect on house prices, and we consider that there is unlikely to be any fall during 1962.—B. L. Wells & Son, Hull.

Scotland. Houses generally have sold at prices 15 per cent. above those obtaining last year and this may well go higher, particularly with the acute shortage of building land ... Farms to lease have been in good demand and record rentals have been paid. A number of farms let in Perthshire have realised rentals of £9 per acre for land for which tenants may only have offered 25s. per acre ten years ago ... Forestry land has still been an attractive investment to certain buyers, and the allowable grants and tax reliefs are probably the cause of this ... Sporting properties, and particularly salmon fishing rights, have been realising increasing prices ...—Kenneth Ryden & Partners, Edinburgh, Glasgow and London.

JUST PUBLISHED

BY CHRISTOPHER JOHNSON LTD.

A new revised edition of

Land-Value Rating

By Lord Douglas of Barloch, K.C.M.G.

In view of the wide and increasing interest now being taken in problems of local government finance and land use, this book is particularly timely. It explains the deficiencies and ill effects of the existing system of local rating. A careful examination is made of such proposed remedies as local income tax, extension of government grants, and equalisation of rates, and the reasons are stated why these are inadequate. The remedy advocated is the rating of land values and the exemption of buildings and improvements, and the economic and social effects of this proposal are fully considered.

Paper Covers 3s. 6d.—Cloth Boards 6s.

From booksellers or by post from

LAND AND LIBERTY PRESS LTD.

177 Vauxhall Bridge Road, London, S.W.1.