

EDITORIAL

There is no moment that is not the right moment to promulgate the teachings of Henry George. But every so often comes an especially propitious time, when the potential audience for this philosophy is particularly receptive.

It may be a time of recession, of unusually burdensome taxation, or of war or other unrest. It is then that people are economically and socially disturbed, seeking answers and solutions.

We think the present era is just such a time. Wars and near-wars are raging; taxes are high and going higher; rent and land costs are rising, while inflation is a growing menace, raising prices and lowering real wages.

A bewildered public helplessly watches a declining economy and a deteriorating social structure, fretfully asking why it is happening and how it can be corrected. What better time for supplying the answers?

We must apply all we know in doing this job - and also learn new ways of doing it more effectively.

Let us who are educated in Georgist thought seize this opportunity now!

HGI JOURNAL
SEP 1971