

CHAPTER IX.

CONCLUSION.

If I have attained any measure of success, it must now be manifest that our present policy stands condemned in that it ever tends to degrade and debase mankind, morally, socially, and physically; and also because it does not, and cannot, exercise any elevating effect in any respect whatever.

It must also be clear that the New System, or a new system, must shortly be attempted if we wish to avoid the calamities that have overtaken older nations, and are already menacing ourselves.

Having discharged my duty to my country in making known what I hope and believe will prove of great advantage to the world, it only remains to express my gratitude to those whose works have touched the same ground, Mr. Henry George, Mr. Edward Bellamy, and Mr. Herbert Spencer; and also to my brother, Mr. T. A. Johnston, for much assistance and many valuable suggestions.
