

goes down on his knees and asks the God of battles to bring victory to the Boers.

While Mr. Fischer and Mr. Wessels were addressing American citizens of English speech in the farther west, Mr. Wolmerans had gone into Michigan, where he addressed American citizens of Dutch speech in their native tongue.

While the Boer envoys were thus appealing to the American people in behalf of Boer independence in South Africa, the American government was continuing its operations against Filipino independence in Asia. That this work is discouraging, however, is shown to some extent by the events of the week. On the 6th it was learned at Manila that the Thirty-third regiment had recently gone through an experience which qualified a majority for the hospital. They had marched 250 miles in the mountains, suffering from hunger and fever, and of 50 horses with which they had begun their march only 13 survived. Nor is that the only discouraging news. Papers have come into the possession of the military authorities at Manila which show that nearly all the mayors installed by Americans in towns within Gen. Young's military district, have been regularly collecting and forwarding taxes for Aguinaldo's government and reporting to Aguinaldo the disposition and movements of American troops. It appears, also, that native telegraphers employed by the American military authorities have been sending to Aguinaldo copies of important telegrams exchanged between American officials. As a slight offset to these discouragements the Americans were able on the 9th to report the capture near Manila of Gen. Pio del Pilar, and on the 12th to announce the bloodless dispersal of a Filipino garrison in the mountains by Gen. Grant and the surrender at other points of two guerrilla leaders. But the glory of these captures was dimmed by an Associated Press report of the 13th from Manila, which disturbs the theory that only the "Tagalog tribes" are unfriendly to the Americans, and that but for them the archipelago would be pacified. Says this report:

The theory that the Filipinos outside of the Tagalog provinces were friendly to American rule has been deeply shaken by recent events. All of the northeastern coast beyond Dagupan is in a state of war and there are frequent fights with heavy losses to the Filipinos. All of the southern provinces inhabited by the Visayans are also turbulent, and in the Camarines, Neuva Carceres and Albay provinces the Americans control only the ground within the picket lines of the garrisons in the coast towns, while these garrisons are the objects of frequent attacks from large insurgent forces. With the exception of Negros, which, being the wealthiest island of the Philippines, is the most friendly to American rule, the Visayan islands show similar conditions. Panay is overrun by the insurgents outside of the American garrisons.

No engagements are distinctively reported, but under the head of casualties in "scouting" the fact is disclosed that both sides continue to suffer losses in both killed and wounded.

American casualties in the Philippines since July 1, 1898, inclusive of all current official reports given out in detail at Washington to May 30, 1900, are as follows:

Deaths to May 16, 1900, (see page 91)	1,847

Wounded	2,152
Total casualties since July, 1898...	4,079
Total casualties reported last week	4,025

In this imperial play of making war to force civilization upon distant countries, France also appears to be preparing to give the world the benefit of a sensational performance. The object of her intentions is Morocco, and her motive will be apparent upon a glance at the map of North Africa. The fortress of Gibraltar, as is well known, enables the British to command the Straits of Gibraltar and thereby the mouth of the Mediterranean sea. If the French could acquire the same right of fortification at Ceuta, on the African shore, they might share with Great Britain this power of control; but to that Great Britain would never consent, and France is not disposed to contest the matter. The French, therefore, look with hope toward opening an overland route, under their own control, from some point on the Atlantic coast of Africa into Algeria, which is already a dependency of France. By that means France would secure a gateway from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean which would not be commanded by British guns. The most available overland route for their purpose is through southern Morocco, from Cape Ghir on the Atlantic, to Fighig on the Algerian border. It is not clear from the news dispatches what France is doing to secure this route, but Morocco, which is an absolute despotism under a sultan, is preparing to resist a military attack. She is mobilizing troops at Fighig in readiness to meet the French advanced posts just across the border in Algeria in the event of a hostile movement on their part. Additional importance is given these warlike preparations by rumors in London that Great Britain proposes to check the French by crossing over into Morocco at Tangier to restore order in the sultan's dominions, upon the plan adopted for the pacification of Egypt.

Farther south in Africa another war is in progress. It is in Ashanti on the northern coast of the Gulf of Guinea, the participants being the natives and the British. Ashanti is a British crown colony, of which Frederic M. Hodgson is the governor. We noted five weeks ago, at page 71, that the native Ashantis had risen in great force and were besieging Coomassie, the colony capital; and a week later, at page 93, that their rebellion was growing more serious, and appeared to have for its object the termination of British rule. After that no news reached this country until the present week; and what comes now gives but little information. Almost all that can be gathered from it is that Coomassie is too closely invested by the natives for runners to get through, and that the British relief expedition, under Col. Willcocks, is meeting with determined opposition in its advance. A severe though apparently unfruitful battle was fought between the 6th and 9th in which there were 100 British casualties. Another had been fought in May; but though the British won it, they were obliged to withdraw, which they did after burning a native village in the sight of its inhabitants. Fifty thousand natives are reported as in arms; and it is said to be impossible for white men to go into the interior.

Back from the dark continent to America, and still there is news of war. A dispatch of the 6th tells of three fierce battles in Colombia,
